

THE ORIGINS, DEVELOPMENTS AND CONTEMPORARY SIGNIFICANCES OF EARLY CHRISTIAN ART

Early Christianity with respect to the first five centuries C.E. is comprised of a vast amount of data which continues to be unraveled to this very day. The keys to unlocking the “truth”, or rather the attempt to arrive at the most accurate representation of the past, given our limited knowledge and the available data - potentially lies not only with certain texts but with copious amounts of art embodied through different mediums including “architecture (cathedral, church), iconography (icon, painting, fresco, mosaic), sculpture (Byzantine ivory statues, Catholic plague columns), wood carving, manuscript miniature, stained glass, oil on canvas and limited edition reproductions.”¹ Due to the nature/limitations of historical studies and sciences, one must make an inference to the best explanation. This is partially accomplished by analyzing the data contextually while using a critical approach – a practice of good hermeneutics. Since no one currently living today was around to witness any of the events or formation of the available historical data one must look at the preponderance of evidence and decide which explanation fits the data more accurately with our current state of knowledge. Moreover, this is precisely why the data must be analyzed critically, by attempting to exhaust all the possible meanings behind the data.

Historian Jonathan Hill states that “[a] society with no grasp of its history is like a person without memory.”² This quote underlies how essential it is for us to understand our past. Understanding our past can provide us with valuable knowledge to unravel mysteries of antiquity, developments of the future and with warnings to avoid the mistakes of human history. Likewise, early Christian art gives us an illuminating glimpse of the early Christian world which has provided and continues to provide historians and theologians with valuable information for understanding Christian antiquity. This paper will examine the origins and development of Christian art, which is deeply indebted to its influences derived from different styles and schools of thought, and the significance of early Christian art with respect to certain functions such as pedagogical purposes.

In our present day it may be difficult to imagine a period where Christian art did not exist. This could be because of how we have been inundated with Christian art and symbols in the Western world. Undoubtedly, it is deeply embedded in Western consciousness, regardless of the diverse religious affiliations. However, indeed there was a period where “craftsman essayed to paint, or carve, or build for the first time something that was to be Christian, with nothing to show them how it should look.”³

The earliest traces of Christian art are commonly dated towards the end of the second century.⁴ Based on the collection of ancient art, we know how Romans, Egyptians and Greeks appeared to be, but no images of David or Solomon or any important Israelite figures have been discovered.⁵ This custom “survived into Jesus’ day and explains why the Christians made no image of him from life.”⁶ A large number of scholars believe that Christian art did not surface until the third century because Christians “observed the Jewish prohibition against the production or use of figurative images for religious purposes – a prohibition established by the second commandment

(Exodus. 20:4-5).”⁷ In some instances scholars believe that this delay can be correlated with Christians wanting to be disassociated from “their idol-worshipping neighbors, whose cult statues or religious images were understood to be the work of demons.”⁸ According Christian apologist, Justin Martyr in his work of I Apology (9.1-9), he cites that the pagans honored cult images with sacrifices while portraying the Christians as finding such practices as lifeless, empty and insulting to the “true God”.⁹ Moreover, Clement of Alexandria and Tertullian both maintain that attributing wood or stone qualities of infinite divinity as absurd and at times “obscene”.¹⁰

Textual evidence seems to suggest that certain theologians did indeed go against the production of cultic art objects for the practice of idolatry while perhaps understanding the difference between that and the functional uses of art whether it was decorative, symbolic or didactic.¹¹ Christians probably understood that smaller objects did not have much significance. So when larger objects did come on to the scene it was not of a great shock since they were not seen as objects of worship and “therefore presented no danger of idolatry.”¹² Some scholars believe that many of the Christian converts that came from a polytheistic background abandoned their old practices since they would recognize it was incompatible with their new faith. However, at the same time it seemed as though they were inclined to adapt certain habits to their new faith. As a number of scholars believe that “‘Christian’ motifs appear to have been modeled on

Graeco-Roman prototypes, albeit reinterpreted to have particular Christian significance.”¹³

Perhaps the most famous example of “this translation from polytheist to Christian artistic type is the Good Shepherd, displayed as a youth dressed in short tunic and boots, carrying a ram or lamb over his shoulders.”¹⁴ This very renowned figure was adopted from the figure of Hermes as a guide to the underworld – usually associated with funerary contexts.¹⁵ The use of the Good Shepherd was used metaphorically for both God and Jesus in John 10. Luke 15:6 as well contains a passage saying “When he [the shepherd] has found it [the lost sheep], he lays it on his shoulders, rejoicing.” Christians could readily associate the iconography with their already inherit beliefs based on the scripture or oral tradition.¹⁶ Other examples of adoption would include a dove which would symbolize the Holy Spirit “as would an anchor, a symbol of hope.”¹⁷ Clement of Alexandria despite his apparent condemnation of using iconography as a form of idolatry had “suggested that when Christians used their signet rings, they should use Christian symbols, such as the dove or a ship (for the Church) or a fish, an anagram for Christ, that is, a word made from the first letters of a phrase. [The Greek word for fish included the initial letters for a phrase, “Jesus Christ, God’s Son, Savior.]”¹⁸

As seen above, many writers and their condemnation of the usage, production or worship of “graven images” which were strictly prohibited by divine law or because of the potential lure for Christians in performing such an act, the same writers “provide testimony that Christian both used and perhaps produced small, everyday objects that carried specific Christian symbols.”¹⁹ Some of these objects which included gems, glassware and lamps can be found in museum collections today were “most likely made by artisans made for Christian customers.”²⁰ It is evident that when the Jews and Christians had parted ways and because of the subsequent conversions of many Gentiles to Christianity, the use of visual images increased significantly.²¹ Christian leaders were stifled with the question of whether the followers of Christianity should be allowed “representational art”, as more and more of them increasingly wanted to design images of Jesus, his family, and his disciples.²² These Christian leaders faced a tremendously difficult question that was consequently the root of much controversy throughout Church history, from the times of Leo I to Constantine V to the Reformation.²³

Yet, the philosophical climate of the third century itself seemed as very anti-material. Plotinus among with others were instructing against materialism. Matter was seen as a hindrance to the spirit not a mirror to it and “therefore it was no longer considered right to express things of spiritual significance in an ideal form.”²⁴ Christianity interestingly enough is “just as far removed from rejection of the world as it is from the undue devotion to it.”²⁵ This is the key to understanding the acceptance of the creation of Christian art. Christians recognize that they belong to a higher cosmic reality outside of this material world which is their destiny to attain but at the same rate belong to material aspect of this world which serves as a trial for the worthiness of the spiritual world. These outlooks and realizations are quite essential because similarly “Christian art has to take the path from realism to the symbolism which removes the supernatural from what is only too near and comprehensible.”²⁶ Christian art created a new form of expression, a vocabulary if you will, through the available forms of classical art. This begets a complicated question – where did Christian art originate?

Apparently, one of the most important aspects for the development of particular art is that of its influences from differing styles. D. Talbot Rice in his book “The Beginnings of Christian Art” eloquently expounds the significance of each legacy of Christian art from different regions and their service to Christian faith:

No art is born suddenly out of nothing; continuity has always been an essential of every phase, and it was especially important in early Christian art. All the regions of the nearer East where Christianity was first preached and practiced had something to give, and there has been a good deal of argument as to which of them – Rome, the Hellenistic world, the east Mediterranean lands that were under Iranian influence – exercised the principal role. This argument, which has often in the past been coloured by a definite partisanship, is not taken up again here. Instead an attempt is made to show what was actually the legacy of each region, and how it was taken over and developed in the service of Christian faith.²⁷

D. Talbot Rice presents three different styles of art: the picturesque style, the expressionist style and the neo-attic style each traces their origins to particular regions.

The picturesque style shaped by its dedication to landscape and elegant architectural decoration - was developed in Pompeii. Rice goes on to suggest that there is “no doubt that it existed in Alexandria also”²⁸ but without giving evidence for it says “no examples have come down to us.” It may be better to conclude there may be reasons to believe it existed in Alexandria but there is as of yet not direct proof to support this assumption. The late century work in the catacomb of Domitilla provides strong evidence for this “picturesque” style, primarily in the scene of the Good Shepherd.²⁹ Jesus is depicted in a landscape surrounded by trees and animals. The theme of the scene is obviously Christian but strongly embodies pagan motifs.³⁰

Secondly, the expressionist style – is described as “more emotional, more violent” and is the terminology that was current during the 1950’s for art criticism.³¹ Scholars believe that this type of art lacked “delicacy”. It was similar to sculpture of ancient Mesopotamia – “was essentially in the same style, and a search after emotion and expression characterized the art of Asia Minor in Hellenistic times.”³² Some scholars believe that the “expressionist” was conceived in Asia Minor as suggested by Morey and others in Syria.³³ Rice attests that “it was mainly thanks to the influence of Syria that the style spread to other places and nowhere was it more intensively developed than in Egypt.”³⁴

The “neo-attic” style played a pivotal role in the formation of Byzantine art and for all early Christian art according to Morey.³⁵ It was developed as a rather conservative Hellenic style two centuries prior to Christ’s birth. It was therefore starkly contrasted from the two other styles. Antioch was a major site for “neo-attic” style according to expert, Morey.³⁶ This particular style went beyond eastern Mediterranean and seemed to have flourished in Rome. An example of “neo-attic” style would be that of a piece of silver “bearing an elegant if rather severe figure seated frontally with animals and birds at the sides , which has been identified as a personification of India.”³⁷

Important insights on the development of Christian art include that of the depictions of Old Testament art which seems to have predated that of the New Testament. Old Testament artistic figures in the catacombs predate that of the New Testament. This is not surprising to scholars. Since the Old Testament was already translated into “Alexandrian Greek” much before the Christian era.³⁸ The New Testament was barely written by the time Christian art had begun. The motifs that were most embodied in the catacombs early on was that of “sin and death” which were first found in the stories of the Old Testament – “Noah standing in his Ark ... recalled the hope of salvation from the deluge of sin.”³⁹ Only after the 200 C.E. in those frescoes can be readily be correlated with the miracles of Jesus. Another important piece of evidence suggesting why Old Testament artistic interpretations preceded that of the New Testament is as some scholars believe, because people were familiar with illustrated books of the Old Testament “and that these picture-books were first produced in Alexandria where the first Greek version of the Old Testament was made.”⁴⁰

As shown previously, that three prominent styles emanating from different regions had a positive impact on early Christian art, so it is with the influence of Jewish exemplars and pictorial art. Of the known catacombs in Rome, one by the name of Via Latina was discovered in 1955 which as been described as very rich in “pictorial decoration”, making it very hard to adequately explain.⁴¹ The actual work besides depicting Jesus, Peter and Paul, undoubtedly a Christian motif, carries many pagan motifs. Unlike the majority of pictures derived from the second until the fourth century which portray biblical scenes where the Old Testament represents a vast majority.⁴²

The influence of Jewish pictorial art was quite widespread as seen with the discovery of the Via Latina Catacomb.⁴³ Jewish art had already developed a picture program by the third century – which was around the time of the beginnings of Christian art, “such picture programs are also attested in Christian sources from the fourth century on, it is difficult to draw any other conclusion than that Christian artists employed optical Jewish exemplars.”⁴⁴ Scholars who strongly support the influence of Rabbinic tradition believe that even in the Via Latina Catacomb it is possible to “conclude the probability of Jewish influence in many examples” but they acknowledge that “an additional Christian understanding can be presumed.”⁴⁵

An example which Schreckenberg and Schubert attest of having convincing Jewish influence is that of the Moses Sequence in Cubicula C and O. The frescos in the Cubicula C and O demonstrate a Christian reinterpretation which can be traced to an “originally Jewish sense.”⁴⁶ The right wall shows the Israelites crossing the Red Sea and on the left a scene is depicted with strong similarities to the resurrection of Lazarus, “indeed the more recent version from the second half of the fourth century in Cubiculum

O has a Lazarus figure added.”⁴⁷ It is currently believed that picture sequence in Cubiculum C is older, than the O which carries the “variant”, so scholars believe that it should be “attempted first of all to account for the details of these scenes in Rabbinic Scripture interpretation on the basis of C.”⁴⁸ Regardless it is clear that Christians have read their own interpretations into various, of these art forms. The addition of Lazarus is strong proof of this. Scholars believe that Cubiculum C is fifty years older than Cubiculum O and believed that even without the adding of Lazarus the conclusion is the same.⁴⁹ Interestingly enough, the Israelites’ crossing of the Red Sea “with dry feet could be understood as a symbol of Christian baptism, to which, on the other hand, God’s presence and his Law as antitype for Christ and the New Testament corresponded.”⁵⁰ The authors conclude that the Moses Sequence and many other art works in the Via Latina catacomb can be traced to the influence of its Rabbinic tradition. Moreover, that without a doubt the art work “appear[s] to stem from Jewish figurative exemplars, must suffice to demonstrate that Jewish figurative art was one of the sources from which early Christian painting benefited.”⁵¹

A significant aspect of early Christian art is that of the functional uses of iconography – that of pedagogical purposes. It is important to understand the meaning of iconography. The combination of the Greek words, eikon and graphe is essential. Eikon means image and graphe means writing, so technically iconography signifies “writing with images”.⁵² Christians necessitated iconography because many of its adherents were not literate therefore pictures became essential for conveying messages to the illiterate.

The following quote by Joseph F. Kelly captures this notion perfectly:

Significantly, this earliest reference to Christian art involves iconography... [commonly regarded] as a source for our knowledge of the early Christians. Christians viewed art as they viewed the Bible, the one a verbal, the other a visual representation of reality beyond words or images. While some art offered portrayals of biblical or Christian scenes, much of it intended to point to other realities. Conveniently, this was also the way in which Christians warded off charges of idolatry, that is, no one worshipped the image, which would be idolatrous, but rather the reality to which it pointed.⁵³

Even to this day pictures are used effectively for political campaigns or marketing ploys.

Some other uses seem to be apparent. In the ancient pagan world, when artists wanted to aid people to visualize a divinity, “they portrayed light emanating from the head in the form of a circle; this is called nimbus.”⁵⁴ Jesus was often portrayed with a special nimbus. Christians also emulated the motif of “wings” to symbolize certain figures as belonging to another world.⁵⁵

The origins and development of early Christian art are indebted to a number of factors. These factors are comprised of certain styles associated with certain regions and practices, converts to Christianity adopting pagan practices, and to more than purely aesthetic functions such as pedagogical uses. Early Christian art did not spring forth without its ancestral roots but rather it is seen as an undisrupted continuous seam extending to ancient religions and practices.
